peasants who worked the land and tended the animals were relatively independent, owing little to anyone outside their village. In other instances, regional lords—often kings—commanded a share of the peasants’ produce and, occasionally, labor services. But all was not pastoral or agricultural in England: here and there, and especially toward the south, were commercial settlements—real emporia.

Map 2.3: Western Europe, c.750